Dear

Today in an effort to try and get the college to do something in order to protect myself against Kevin, I went in to meet with Christopher Roelke, the Dean of the College, to talk. I was accompanied by [REDACTED] who also works for the school. In the meeting, I expressed my concerns for my safety, and explained how Kevin has broken the no-contact order multiple times. I told them that there is a huge difference between feeling safe and actually being safe. As I understand it, and I could be incorrect, Dean Roelke is the person at Vassar who made the final decision in regards to the sanctioning of my case. When I told the Dean my concerns, he looked very nervous and essentially placed the decisions of the sanctioning on the Judge's recommendations, even though the college interprets those decisions in any way they choose. Then he gave me his personal cell phone number and told me that he would be in touch within the hour, which he did follow through with. Then he went on to tell me that I should call him first if anything was to happen and to do so before I called security. I felt very uncomfortable that all of a sudden the college was amenable to doing something on my behalf. I feel like he may have realized that the college fucked up and is doing what he can to cover his/the school's ass. I think it would be a dumb decision to call him before security considering that he would not be required to make any sort of formal report. I do not trust the administration because they have time and time again proven to me that they do not take me or my safety seriously. I thought you should know what happened.
